About York Central Hospital

York Central Hospital serves the population in southern York Region, a rapidly growing area in south-central Ontario which has recently surpassed 1 million inhabitants. The hospital provides compassionate, high quality and timely care to over 225,000 patients each year through its 8 Clinical Programs and 11 Medical Departments. The hospital is also home to the York Region Dialysis Program, the Regional Domestic Abuse and Sexual Assault Care program and the District Stroke Centre. In 2007/08, York Central Hospital was responsible for over 1200 days of medical student and resident training and also provided extensive learning opportunities for other students such as physiotherapists, medical laboratory technologists, occupational and respiratory therapists, nurses and others. The hospital is part of a research collaborative with York University and with them, and other organizations, is currently participating in about 40 studies. A Director of Medical Education and Research has been appointed by our medical staff to help raise the internal profile of the hospital's research activity and to provide support for those clinicians interested in education and/or research.

Over the past several years, York Central Hospital has undergone a major redevelopment project which has resulted in many significantly expanded physical facilities including new Labor and Delivery, Dialysis, Mental Health, Diagnostic Imaging, and Emergency areas. In addition, the hospital has embarked on a transformational journey to better position it in the evolving health care delivery system. These changes will allow for the expansion of its education and research activities, now and in the future.

"This agreement with MD Health will now take our clinical research to a new level," says Dr. Larry Grossman, the hospital's Chief of Staff. "It ensures that we remain on the cutting edge of medical practice."
